Wounds that Speak

We are headed into Christmas. The general theory of the Christ-birth seems now to be that it was warm and cuddly and angels were everywhere. I would say that this is not the picture the Bible paints. It would have been a hugely challenging time for Joseph and especially for Mary who could have been stoned to death for becoming pregnant without being married. Jesus was born into a fragile peace and was vulnerable to elimination for the first years of His life. As we draw near to the end of this period of waiting, popularly known as Advent, I would like to pass on some helpful and challenging words I have read recently. Firstly, a warning from the actor Alan Alda, "Your assumptions are your windows on the world. Scrub them off every once in a while, or the light won't come in."

Secondly, a helpful quote from Frederich Nietzsche: "If you do not find eternity here (in this world), you are probably not going to find it anywhere else."

Thirdly, I have been studying the book of Judges and even though I have read it many times, I still find myself shocked by its content. If you have a strong stomach, read chapter nineteen! Anyway, the helpful thing I found was when reading chapter twenty, headed in my version 'Israel's war with Benjamin': in other words, there was civil war. What I took away as I read about the Israelites' perseverance when it appeared they were losing the fight against the Benjaminites, was that we should persevere in prayer even when circumstances seem to be going the opposite direction.

Fourthly, I have been preparing to take funerals this week. Dear Enid's was on Friday and John's—who reached one hundred last Christmas—is on Tuesday. One of the issues for me—and I fully understand—is the desire that no one becomes upset at a funeral. In Israel when Jesus lived, the custom was for the mourners to tear their clothing. That was known as kriah. We must recognise that wounds must be allowed to speak

A prayer:

God of our wounds,

Help me to be unafraid to make my kriah.

Help me to let my wounds speak.

Help me to see that the first step to healing can be tearing. AMEN
